The History of Exchequer

How do you say the name and where did it come from?

Exchequer (pronounced X-checker) is the name for the National Treasury of England. The restaurant is located in the financial and banking district of Chicago, and was originally patterned after an English style public house in 1969. Hence our name – Exchequer Restaurant & Pub.

History

The 226 South Wabash building has been occupied by restaurants since the Roaring 20's. The first restaurant was a Speakeasy known as the 226 Club and was frequented by Al Capone.

In the 1930's and 1940's the club was reopened as a restaurant and renamed. The Wonder Spa & Restaurant was a full-service eatery with an elaborate bar in the back serving locals and workers.

During the 1950's and 1960's the restaurant was renamed Browns and was reinvented. Browns was a casual dining establishment with hand carved sandwiches, a steam table buffet, full liquor bar, and peanut shells littering their floors.

In 1969 Browns closed down. The restaurant was completely remodeled, the bar was relocated once again, and it was renamed to the Exchequer Pub. The new menu was limited, but it featured Exchequer's famous deep dish pizza and has been the Pub's signature item ever since.

In 1982 the Mannos family bought the restaurant and took over possession in March of that year. They immediately revamped the menu and added their own homemade house favorites including: ribs, burgers, soups, salads, fish, and chops. In 1997 the restaurant expanded to the 224 South Wabash building to accommodate larger parties. Since then the Exchequer has continued to be a popular destination for business lunches, after work happy-hours, family dinners, student and faculty networking, university functions, and tourists.

The Mannos family is currently operating the Exchequer Pub under third generation management and ownership. We'd like to welcome you and hope to continue serving you for years to come.
